The Tribal Juvenile Healing to Wellness Court addresses and responds to alcohol and substance use related issues through a holistic, youth-focused, and culturally-centered approach. Juvenile Healing to Wellness Courts (JHWC) are operated by an interdisciplinary team drawn from a cross-section of the Tribal community. This two-part learning series will focus on the need for effective case management and referral to appropriate services to support JHWC participants. This series is appropriate for newly developing and existing courts as well as communities who are interested in learning more about Juvenile Healing to Wellness Courts.

Session 1: Understanding Tribal Youth Substance Use, Trends and Considering Community Factors. In this session participants will learn about the disease model of addiction and how this applies to tribal youth. Participants will additionally learn about the prevalence of substance use in tribal communities, including drugs of abuse and current drug trends in Tribal communities. Participants will be able to identify community factors that may influence Tribal youth substance use and identify resources within Tribal communities that can assist with treatment and rehabilitation of those youth who are using alcohol and drugs.

Session 2: Case Management Models and Treatment Services to Support Juvenile Healing to Wellness Court Participants. In this session participants will survey case management models and consider issues such as communication, confidentiality and reporting. Participants will consider how treatment services operate in coordination with components of the youth’s individualized case plan. Participants will engage in peer-to-peer dialogue regarding community resources that may support overall Juvenile Healing to Wellness Court services and operations.
